Edward Fitch's age-faded eyes sparkled as they watched the laborers chip away at the pink granite blocks blackened by fire. Since, when a small boy, he had left this point of land jutting into the muddy Yadkin River, Edward had dreamed of returning to build a cottage here where he could spend his last years in serenity.

Three generations of Fitches had farmed this piece of land and many additional acres. Edward had been unable to buy back the entire acreage. However, he was satisfied; all he really wanted was this site of the original family homestead plus the place he had spent many countless happy boyhood hours fishing.

Financial distress had forced his father to sell the farm and move the family to town. Edward had worked since he'd been twelve. He had put himself through State University, graduating as a druggist. Years had gone by. He had opened his own drugstore, married, raised a family, prospered and saved his money. After his wife died and his children married and moved away, he bought the land. He spent long hours after the store closed at night, studying books on construction and drawing plans to scale. He would use the pink granite foundation stones of the old house; the fire had harmed them in no way, only blackened them.

The winter wore on. Edward arranged to sell the drugstore in February when his elderly builder promised the cottage would be finished. Day after day, he went out to watch the pink stones lose their black coat and the walls of his little cottage rise. In talking with the builder, he learned that before the American Revolution a tavern had stood here. It had burned as had several other structures erected on the site before and after the one built by Edward's great-grandfather.

At last the cottage was completed. A mixture of old and new, it contained the latest labor-saving devices, was electrified and furnished with antiques Edward had painstakingly collected.

The night he moved in, he bolted the front door, stretched out on the bed and watched the logs burning slowly in the huge fireplace. Suddenly he heard hoof-beats and a clink as if a carriage wheel had struck a stone. These sounds were followed by the sound of someone digging in the front yard.

Snatching up a flashlight, Edward hurried to the front door and reached for the bolt. To his amazement, the bolt had been pulled back. An investigation of the grounds disclosed no signs of digging. Puzzled, Edward went back to bed.

A loud crash of something landing on the floor awakened him. He switched on the light. Nothing was on the floor!

Night after night, these sounds were repeated. And sometimes Edward heard footsteps in the cellar. He became nervous, uncertain, when he could find no evidence of anyone prowling the cottage.

Ten days passed and the old builder came out to settle up some final business. Edward told him what had been going on.

"I'm not surprised," the old man said. "Remember I told you my grandfather said a tavern once stood here?" Edward nodded. "One night a guest, on his way North to buy machinery with a bag of gold, stopped here. Next morning he was nowhere to be found. Other guests said he had ridden away before dawn. But the old cook declared the missing guest had been murdered for his gold and buried in the nearby woods. The killer did not get the gold though. Some months later, the bag of it dropped from a rafter to crash on the taproom floor. My grandfather also said that, in revenge, the murdered guest's ghost had marked this site for fire. Reckon he was right."

Although Edward's nerves were shaken, he stayed on in his beloved cottage . . . until, a year later, he returned from a trip to town to find a heap of blackened ruins.

The vengeful ghost had struck again.
